Laryngeal Chondriosis: histology and pathology. The histology of laryngeal chondriosis is characterized by the presence of large, multinucleated, foamy cells that are often arranged in a palisade pattern. These cells are typically found in the submucosa of the larynx, and they can cause significant swelling and distortion of the surrounding tissue. The histology of laryngeal chondriosis is often compared to that of chondrosarcoma, but the two conditions are distinct. In laryngeal chondriosis, the cells are typically arranged in a palisade pattern, while in chondrosarcoma, the cells are typically arranged in a more disorganized pattern. The histology of laryngeal chondriosis is often compared to that of chondrosarcoma, but the two conditions are distinct.
